Amanda Dash, Shell's head of renewables in the Americas, will leave the company in January to head up Denmark's Orsted in the US.

The veteran executive's departure comes shortly after Shell announced it would pause investment in new offshore wind projects as Chief Executive Wael Sawan focused on more profitable operations.

Amanda Dash joined Shell almost 20 years ago and has spent most of her career in the oil and gas business. Since 2022, she has led Shell's offshore wind development in North America and renewables in South America.

She will join Orsted on January 13, Reuters reports.

According to Orsted, the company currently has 11 gigawatts of projects underway in North and South America. (Angi . ru)
